

Would a 'tablet' be of benefit to me?

By James A. Siffard

Tablet computers are becoming increasingly more popular with their highly-portable size and powerful, industry-related applications arriving on the scene every day. While certain tablets receive more attention, each manufacturer offers different functionality such as cameras, improved file sharing and download speeds, more memory, bigger (or smaller, depending on your preference) screens, longer battery life and many other convenient attributes.

At about half the price and significantly smaller than a traditional laptop, this handy tool allows you to better orchestrate your daily plan resulting in a more efficient use of time and increased productivity. You won't have to run back to the office or boot up a laptop to access a dynamic sales presentation, input customer data, capture sales call notes, record a price quote or get a status update on an existing order. Your tablet will let you edit documents on the fly, place an order through a web-based ordering system like FASTWeb, a First American Title Insurance Company platform, and check your e-mail to determine whether the commitment is ready on another file.

Whether you've already jumped into the tablet world or are still sitting on the sidelines, you should at least check out the new applications for business and the real estate industry. Tablets are not just a gadget anymore. They can be used to streamline your workflow and have some fun at the same time.
